The new administration under President-elect Joe Biden will be taking office with an ambitious list of workplace-related priorities. Many of these are directly targeted at reversing the course set by the Trump administration over the last four years. In this article, Jessica discusses the anticipated changes Biden's workplace agenda will bring in the new year.

"There is virtually no doubt that COVID-19 will be the Biden administration's top priority on day one. The Biden transition team has already made very clear that, among many other things, we can expect to see a swift push for the Occupational Safety and Health Administration to issue mandatory safety guidelines and pressure for Congress to take action to provide for more enhanced unemployment benefits and emergency leave rights — if they have not yet done so."
